

The Artist Among Us

In March of 2020 when the lockdown began, like many others, Tina Williams began to panic. All of a sudden she found herself going from non-stop activity and work to a complete standstill. Prone to panic attacks, finding something to do was not only a want, but a need, so she turned to art.

As a child and teenager, Tina had done quite a bit in oil and acrylics, but was never happy with it and never quite understood the medium. It left her frustrated and disappointed. So, she decided to try watercolor.

It was like a language she had always known how to speak. Everything made sense. Tina posted her very first attempt on Facebook and, to her surprise, three people wanted to purchase that piece.

In 2020, Tina sold over 300 pieces of art. At the time, it was meant to be a hobby to keep her busy, but over the last few years not only has this become a quickly growing and thriving business, continuing to offer her peace and comfort, but it has for others as well.

Teaching watercolor has become just as important to Tina as growing this business to whatever corners it can reach. She is proof that it's never too late to try something new. You never know what magic awaits.
